By Faye L. Bowring
Although my husband and I have "gone fishing instead of wishing" more than our share in the past, neither one of us found these "tales" of fishing and hunting, etc. to be hysterical or particularly funny. My husband finished the Moon Holler Misfits book but I didn't as I have too many other books to read. It is one of those cases of "different strokes for different folks."

By C. Mooney
Moon Holler Misfits is a delightful and humorous book that I had trouble putting down. The author, Jimmy Moore, described his experiences so life like that I felt I was right there with the Misfits. His unique writing style is almost a lost art these days. Being an outdoorsman for more than 40 years, I could relate to most of the experiences of his fun-filled group. I'm already looking forward to his next book.

When I was a young boy growing up in Alabama, I loved to read the humor of legendary outdoor storytellers, Corey Ford and Robert Roark. I could hardly wait for my monthly issue of Field Stream magazine to arrive. Their humor kindled my lifelong love affair with fishing and hunting. However, in today's outdoor magazines and books, it's about the "how to, where to, when to", with very little of the "old time" stories appearing. There are also those who'd do away with fishing and hunting entirely. I'm afraid that if this trend continues, hunters and anglers will become an endangered species and that within 30 to 40 years hunting and fishing as we know it will be obsolete. As a member of the outdoor writing fraternity, I just cannot stand idly by and let this happen. I must do my part to keep the storytelling alive. My purpose in writing this book is to help re-ignite classic outdoor humor, which has dwindled, not from lack of an audience, but because outdoor editors feel they must do the "how to", etc. to survive. They can do both, tell a story that makes readers want to get out and do it, and also tell where it happened and how they did it. I will continue writing humorous outdoor stories, that tell of what went on during the trip, the humorous things that happened and the lessons learned. My goal is to pass them on to future generations. If you like entertaining and humorous true to life outdoor adventures, my book is for you. Hopefully, you'll pass it on to your children, so that they too might help carry the torch.
